Millar Aileen Lovitt [Previous work has consistently found that belief in a just world is strongly correlated with societal privilege. In the present study, we examined the influence of physical attractiveness on belief in a just world. We hypothesized that physically attractive individuals would be stronger endorsers of belief in a just world, whereas less attractive individuals would be less likely to endorse belief ... \[Show full abstract\] in a just world.](#)

Both self-rated attractiveness \(experiment one\) and attractiveness rated by other persons \(experiment two\) were found to predict endorsement of belief in a just world. Additionally, both attractiveness measures were found to have a relationship with participant's level of life satisfaction. These findings suggest that physical attractiveness powerfully affects our subjective experience as a human and that just-world beliefs are driven, at least in part, by personal experience with inequality.

However, the empirical research on corporate domain provides contrary results and completely fails to explain the interactive mechanism of the above mentioned key determinants. This study examines and provides an overview of the spurious relationships and black boxes in corporate governance domain particularly between the board characteristics, its structure, and on firm performance.

The study provides the integrated mechanism of firm performance, linking association and mechanism between various constructs to shape further research in corporate governance domain.
